AI Overview

The average export price of cable trays from North Korea is approximately $206.24 per unit, with costs varying based on type, material, and specifications suitable for computer rooms.

Overview of Cable Trays for Computer Rooms

Cable trays are essential for organizing and supporting power, data, and communication cables in server rooms and data centers. For computer rooms, perforated or ladder-style trays are commonly used because they provide good airflow, reduce heat buildup, and allow easy access for maintenance and future expansion. Materials such as stainless steel or aluminum are preferred for durability, corrosion resistance, and long-term reliability in controlled environments.

Pricing Context

North Korean Export Price: According to trade data, the average export price for cable trays from North Korea is $206.24 per unit. This figure represents a general market price and may vary depending on tray size, material, and configuration.

Material and Type Influence: Ladder trays, perforated trays, and solid-bottom trays differ in cost. Stainless steel trays are more expensive due to their corrosion resistance and mechanical strength, while aluminum or galvanized steel trays are generally more affordable.

Commercial Alternatives:

For comparison, international suppliers such as RS Hong Kong or Alibaba list server room cable trays ranging from $50 to $300 per unit, depending on size, material, and load capacity.

Considerations for Computer Room Installation

Capacity Planning: Choose trays with 20–30% extra capacity to accommodate future cable expansion.

Thermal Management: Open designs like ladder trays improve airflow and reduce heat accumulation in high-density server rooms.

Environmental Protection: Perforated or solid-bottom trays protect cables from dust, moisture, and other contaminants, which is critical in sensitive computer environments.
